This study was designed to compare the effects of placebo or naltrexone on behavioral eating-related events, mood, and self-concept in 12 women with bulimia. Six women received placebo and six naltrexone in a single-blinded, balanced order, crossover design. Naltrexone significantly reduced the reported frequency of bingeing and purging and significantly reduced changes in mood and self-concept over the day following each medication. Naltrexone was well tolerated. Drug-induced autoimmunity accounts for between 10 and 15% of the idiopathic forms of acute and chronic liver diseases. The spectrum of hepatitis ranges from acute hepatitis (AH), which may be fulminant or subclinical, to chronic hepatitis (CH). In the latter, the clinical picture is that of a cholestatic hepatitis. PBC is characterized by the presence of high levels of antibodies to mitochondrial (AMA) antigens. In contrast, AIH can be considered as a drug-induced autoimmune disease. At present the available data are mainly based on small case series and controlled clinical trials; only one randomised clinical trial has been reported. Different pathogenetic mechanisms may be responsible for drug-induced autoimmune hepatitis, including drug-induced liver injury (DILI), molecular mimicry, cross-reactivity, polyclonal stimulation of the immune system, and an immunological memory process; the last one probably plays a predominant role.As an earlier commenter mentioned, we have replaced and reconfigured the tuning desk and the speakers so the new system offers a smoother and cleaner sound.
