In the early 19th century, when the mariner's compass was invented, the compass was checked for accuracy by measuring its deviation from the magnetic south Pole. The compass was only accurate between the magnetic north Pole and the magnetic South Pole. A first systematic improvement was introduced by Lord Kelvin in 1846 when he invented the concept of the magnetic zone. In his book The Kelvin Lectures on Electricity and Magnetism (1869), published in the year of Kelvin's death, F. W. Baily showed that the maximum error in north magnetic latitude for compasses using a sector of angle arcs was less than 0.5% for a maximum magnetic latitude of 85 degrees. An instrument was developed in 1854 in the Navy Hydrographic Office (NHO) by Samuel Holland and John James Audubon in Saint Petersburg, Russia, to measure the declination. This instrument consisted of a magnetic compass with the horizontal base aligned with the axis of the earth and a horizontal graduated arc with the perpendicular of the base intersecting the axis of the earth. The instrument was connected to a star board of the SRG (Stereographic Survey of Great Britain) that was placed close to the pole and used for measuring terrestrial magnetism with the aid of a sextant. By 1858, instrumentation was so advanced that a personal compass could determine north within 0.01 degree. As the instrumentation improved, the minimum measuring accuracy was also improved. Instruments were introduced in the late 1800s that allowed for the measurement of magnetic north within a minimum of 0.001 degree. 10/14/2014 Ufcundisputed3pccrackonly [Maps Canada Road Map.
